My Vision for Myself

As far back as I can remember, I have been committed to figuring out what my goal in life would be. I always wondered who I was and what I wanted to do with my life. It has been a great challenge for me ever since, and I have been hoping that I would eventually find it out someday. I knew that whatever my goal was, it would be rewarding and meaningful, and one that would ensure happiness and a feeling of accomplishment.

My parents have been a significant inspiration in my efforts in determining what I can and cannot do. My mother, father, and aunt have always been pushing me to strive for success, whether in school related material or just simple life lessons. For example, when I was six years old, my mother sent me to karate. At first I could not tolerate it, but over the years I gradually began to appreciate it. I eventually received my “black belt” when I was thirteen, and I had never felt such a sense of accomplishment.

When I was fourteen, my parents enrolled me into Alma Heights Christian High School. I did not know what to expect and I was faced with two choices: I could either choose the classes that would seem the most reasonable and accomplishable, or the classes that were the most challenging and rewarding. For me, this was no choice at all, and so I took the more challenging courses. In general, I knew that in order to achieve great things, I would first have to achieve great challenges that could actually help me accomplish my aspirations. For example, I had recently taken a computer programming course at Stanford University. They were very challenging to me but in the end, I was able to program my own video games that would have seemed difficult at first.

In conclusion, I hope to accomplish some important goals in my life. The sky's the limit and I have already started thinking about college applications and career opportunities, such as aerospace engineering or in some different field of science. I have always been fascinated by these subjects, and I hope to learn them in a great university. It will be challenging to accomplish these goals, but no one has said that it was going to be easy. These experiences that I have gone through so far aspire me to be accepted one day at an "ivy league" university.
